1. The question of adapting care to gender is an issue that has been underestimated and that must be considered. In the present day, it is no longer possible to imagine that research is only based on a young man's frame of reference.

Given the variability in access to healthcare among men, it is imperative that the medical community adapts its strategies to ensure optimal patient care.

This necessitates a collaborative effort between the medical community and society at large to reduce gender bias and masculinist values.

This article looks at the issues that may be involved in these complex processes in the light of COVID-19 and shows how relevant they are.

2. it could be shortened but corresponds to the content of the article: A Narrative Literature Review of Understanding Men's Help-Seeking Behaviours.
3. The introduction includes two subsections, "Help-seeking" and "Masculinity." A potential alternative structure would be to group these subsections under a single "Research Context" subsection.
4. The references are extensive and appear to be sufficiently recent for the 15 articles selected for review.
5. Two errors were identified that require attention. See comments in the Text

I don't see any ethical concerns in this paper. I do not detect any conflicts of interest or gender bias in the paper's content. I don't think a disclaimer is needed.
