

Review-2

This article presents a timely and crucial examination of forced migration. Forced migration is now impacting people globally, and the author shows this by describing migration in several countries. Which urge the scientific community to recognize force migration as an interdisciplinary crisis that demands urgent, attention and evidence-based solution.

I felt, that author gave a good history of the problem, however, the section of the 21 St, century seem to end bluntly and it goes into another section on climate change and the future of immigration policy. It seems that the author does not prepare the reader to for the next section. A transition statement or a paragraph leading into the section on climate change and the future of immigration Policy is needed.

Specific Comments:

Climate Change and the Future of Immigration: An Urgent Policy Imperative

This section is vital for preparing the reader by grounding the current crisis in historical context. It will first explore the escalating role of climate change as a driver of forced migration in the 21st century, demonstrating how environmental degradation has already reshaped global displacement patterns. By establishing this foundation, the narrative will smoothly pivot to its central argument: how these realities must now dictate and fundamentally reshape future immigration and asylum policies. I recommend that the author add a section on the:

1. At the end of the 21st Century: How Climate Change Has Impacted the Problem of Migration (The Past & Present Context)
2. Climate Change and the Future of Immigration Policy (The Policy Imperative)

This will add to the flow of the article.
